The remainder of the meeting was a presentation from Principal Nate Rouse and assistant principals Jason Dennis and Jennifer Hoffman on the Equal Opportunity Schools (EOS) program, which is designed to increase the participation and performance of students of color in AP classes.

EOS is a program involving 117 schools across the country. It began at OPRF by gathering a census of students in AP classes and identifying under-represented groups. The school also conducted a survey of students... identified as eligible for AP classes but currently not taking any. According to Rouse, when asked why they were not taking AP courses, students provided reasons that included “nobody asked me to,” “it might hurt my GPA,” and “nobody in those classes look like me.” The research also attempted to identify “trusted adults” for kids who would benefit from encouragement to take AP courses.

For the 2016-17 school year, OPRF identified 244 students whom administrators felt should be encouraged to take AP classes, and of that number 166 have enrolled in such courses.

During a robust Q&A with council members, discussion focused on the idea of increasing diversity in honors classes as well.
