The recent docu-series "America to Me" gave us an eye-opening look into OPRF High School and how our black and white students' educational experiences are dramatically different.

How do the institutional and individual behaviors seen in "America to Me" manifest long before high school?

Stacey A. Gibson will focus on parenting racially aware youth in this time of overt racialized behaviors. She will introduce practical strategies that can be used by families to recognize interpersonal and systemic patterns of race-based oppression and help us move toward truth-centered justice based equity in our school.

Join us MARCH 14th for an interesting interactive lecture seminar.

Stacey A. Gibson is an educator, consultant, and writer working in Chicago to support organizations and institutions that have a vested interest in moving beyond 'diversity conversations' to exploring and articulating how patterns of race-based oppression shape interactions, institutions, and opportunities.
